

IM WALD

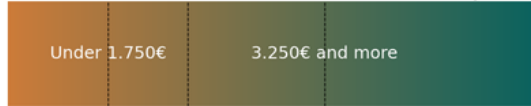

Forests in Focus: Ecological Trends, Threats, and the Path to Conservation

Made by Pedro Terressan Alves

Datasets from Statista research and some official German sources (e.g. GESIS – Leibniz-Institut für Sozialwissenschaften)

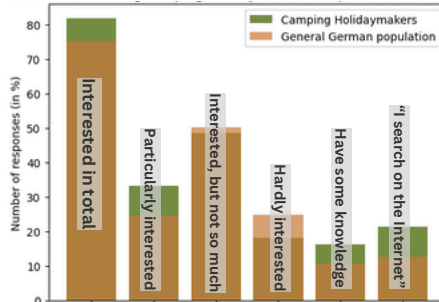

The following study tries to answer the question: What are the ecological and economic impacts of hiking on German forests - both positives and negatives? The goal is to visualize how nature and local communities are affected by hiking.

Income Level of Intensive Hikers in Germany

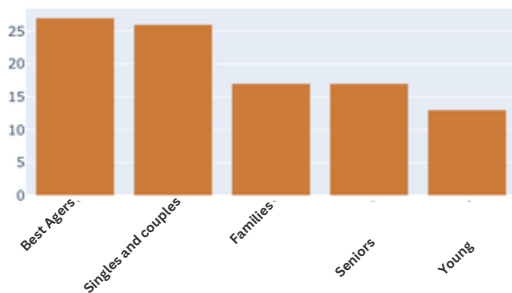

Income Level of Intensive Hikers in Germany, ranging from under 1.750€ (19%) to 3.250€ and more (40%)

Interest in ecological problems among camping holidaymakers compared to German population

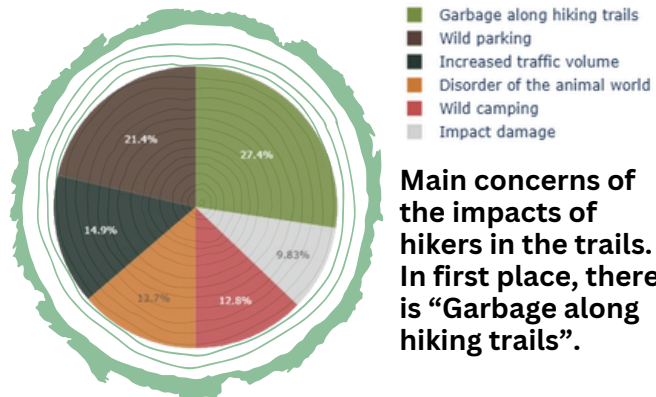

Camping-enjoyers are more concerned about environmental problems, with 81% interested in total and 16.2% having enough knowledge to give advice, against 75% and 10.6%, respectively, among the German population.

Which age groups are the most present between hikers?

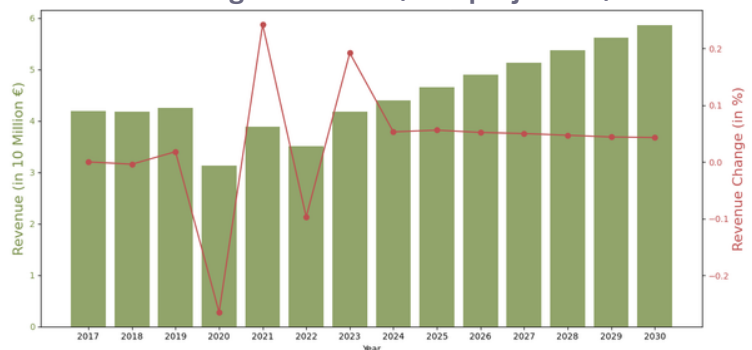

The largest (27%) age group among hikers in Germany is the "best aged," people from 50 to 65 years old. They are followed by single people and couples without children (26%). This indicates that hikers are predominantly more mature individuals.

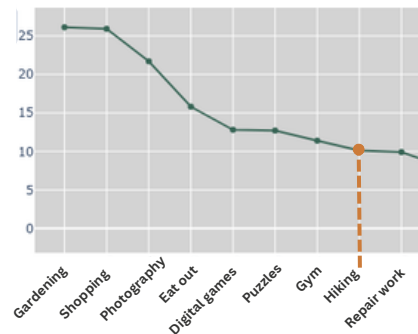

Main concerns of the impacts of hikers in the trails. In first place, there is "Garbage along hiking trails".

German National Parks revenue and revenue change over time (with projection)

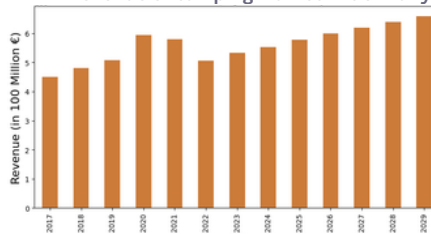

The change of revenue of German National Parks over the years shows the positive economic impact of the hiking culture.

10.1% of the German population consider hiking their preferred activity in leisure time. That means, roughly, 8.3 Million people.

How hiking benefits the camping market in Germany compared to other countries

Revenue of camping market in Germany

The top 10 countries with the most positive change in their camping market revenue compared to Germany are not from Europe.

India, Cyprus, Sierra Leone, Suriname, Sudan, Philippines, Thailand, Iran, Indonesia, Burundi.

Revenue of camping market

Hiking contributes to the camping equipments market in Germany and all over the world.

